What are Children's Museums?

From, "The Case for Children's Museums". Children's museums are unique places that bring children, families and communities together for quality interaction. Offering lifelong learning opportunities for audiences, children's museums are vital cultural institutions. Serving as beacons amid a frenzied environment, children's museums celebrate play and creativity; provide activities that nurture family relationships; establish common ground in communities; collaborate with traditional educational and social service organizations and build creative communities that improve the quality of life. Grounded in well-established pedagogy, children's museums are leading a movement that combines specific learning objectives with play in informal learning environments. As highly desirable meeting places and as proponents of play, children's museums bring a world of possibilities to families who want the best for their children.

- Unlike traditional museums, children (and adults) are encouraged to interact with the exhibits; enhancing and supporting learning – they are 'for somebody' rather than 'about something'
- Maybe be the first museum experience for a visitor. Its less intimidating format opens the door to more traditional museums and provides a safe and supportive environment, "...especially to those who traditionally feel uncomfortable attending museums, including first time learners (children or adults), and non-English speakers". (Edeiken, 1992)

Children's museums are very popular attractions. On average they draw substantially higher levels of visitation per square foot of space than traditional museums.

Children's museums have a very high level of repeat visitations as children ask to be taken again and again.

Children's museums have the ability to attract the family market.
